

Epidemiological Pressures on the Evolution of Social Complexity

Nina H. Fefferman,

Rutgers University, New Brunswick, NJ, USA

fefferman@aesop.rutgers.edu

The evolution of socially complex systems, arising from individual behaviors, is usually thought to have occurred despite the increasing risks of infection as social contact increases. We will explore some simulation models that demonstrate how particular organizational strategies might actually have been protective as contact increased.